

Cataloguing the Legacy of Lady Waldegrave & the Stern Family

Highlights & Inventory

INTRODUCTION

by Dr Rosalind White, Collections Assistant

Strawberry Hill House, famed for its Gothic architecture and its association with Horace Walpole, is a site with a rich history that extends well beyond its eighteenth-century origins. In the nineteenth and early twentieth century, the house was occupied, furnished, and decorated with sumptuous collections by two owners: Lady Frances Waldegrave and the Stern family.

In 1838, Frances Braham—the striking daughter of celebrated Jewish singer John Braham—attended a party at Strawberry Hill House, where she captured the hearts of both John and George Waldegrave, sons of the 6th Earl. It was John, the Earl's illegitimate son, who declared his love that same evening. The two married in 1839, but just over a year later, John's reckless lifestyle led to his untimely death, leaving Frances widowed at just 19.

Soon after, George, John's legitimate brother, proposed. Their controversial marriage—illegal under English law—led them to elope to Gretna Green. Within seven months of marriage, George's 'riotous behaviour' landed him in prison. In mounting debt, he sold off Walpole's treasured collection in what became known as the Great Sale of 1842.

When George died suddenly in 1846, Frances was widowed once again—but this time, she inherited Strawberry Hill, the Somerset estates, and the Radstock collieries. From her first marriage to John, she had already inherited the Essex estates, including Dudbrook Hall.

For fourteen years, Strawberry Hill languished, its rooms virtually empty and neglected. In 1854, a visitor noted its impending ruin, remarking 'its end is near at hand'.

Armed with a substantial inheritance and having married her third husband, Conservative MP George Granville Harcourt, Lady Waldegrave embarked on an ambitious project: to breathe new life into Walpole's beloved home. She adorned the domed ceiling above the staircase with stained-glass quatrefoil skylights and a constellation of gold stars on a backdrop of deep blue. She lovingly picked out wallpaper, cultivating a careful formula for its selection: floral patterns for women's chambers and bird motifs for men's. Her dedication to the decorative arts extended right down to the doorknobs, which — to this day — house exquisite examples of nineteenth-century craftsmanship.

'Here I am', she wrote in 1857, 'settled in this most enchanting of all charming places. I am certain that you have not the faintest idea of its now wonderful beauty. Altho' it poured all yesterday [guests] thought it the most intoxicating place they had ever seen'.

In the late 1850s and early 1860s, she made a host of architectural alterations that both improved the house's practicalities and exaggerated its Gothic silhouette: adding an entirely new wing, a battlemented wall, an entrance gateway, and a clock-turret, topped off with four moulded Tudor-style chimneystacks. Edward Lear observed her hands-on involvement: describing her as 'as proud as possible, happy as a child [...] plain black dress tucked up [...] giving directions to the builders about a hundred things'.

Frances's restoration of Strawberry Hill was not simply funded by inheritance—it was built on her business acumen and careful management of her estates. Unlike many aristocratic women of her time, she took an active role in running her affairs, particularly the Radstock collieries, a major coal supplier in Somerset.

After inheriting the collieries in 1846, she took full control in 1847, ending existing leases and restructuring the business under her own name. Determined to protect her investment, she even pursued legal action against rival firms using similar branding. Beyond mining, she invested in the 1854 expansion of the Great Western Railway to Radstock, modernising coal transport by replacing canal routes with rail and overseeing new road construction and housing developments that transformed the town.

Frances's fourth and final marriage in 1863, to Liberal MP Chichester Fortescue, strengthened Strawberry Hill's reputation as a centre of high-society life—its gatherings now so renowned they caused periodic traffic jams stretching back to Twickenham Station. As The Graphic put it, 'Strawberry Hill was the Mecca towards which the eyes of the ambitious turned with longing looks, for it was there that Lady Waldegrave held court, and very carefully did she choose her courtiers... This one craved for a place, Lady Waldegrave procured it for him; that one was eager to obtain a title, Lady Waldegrave obtained it for him; another yearned for social recognition, in an instant every door in Mayfair flew open to receive him'.

During this epoch of her life, Lady Waldegrave masterfully used the house and its interiors to build upon her marriage's social and political capital. As Claire Leighton has detailed in her chapter dedicated to Lady Waldegrave's exacting design choices, the rooms of Strawberry Hill were carefully curated to promote private discussion with the buxom, button-tufted furniture arranged in discrete clusters. What's more, she had a 'keen awareness of the politics of display', strategically grafting herself onto Walpole's legacy, by incorporating her personal crest, initials, and coronet into countless decorative objects throughout the house — from the Gallery's parquet floor, inlaid with her shield and insignia, to the heraldic badges in the Round Room's stained glass.

In 1883, Strawberry Hill was purchased by Herman Stern, a German-born Portuguese baron, merchant banker, and one of the richest men in Britain. His son, Herbert later married Aimée Geraldine Bradshaw, and together they revived Strawberry Hill's reputation as a glamorous social hub.

Following Herbert's elevation to the peerage as Baron Michelham of Hellingly, extravagant garden parties became a hallmark of Strawberry Hill. Prime ministers, foreign princes, aristocrats, and high-society figures graced these lavish gatherings, which were prominently featured in The Tatler and The Sketch. These were no ordinary garden parties—they were spectacles. Guests were entertained by Russian ballet star Anna Pavlova, mime artist Malcolm Scott, American singer Ethel Levey, and even a baby elephant in the garden.

One of the most memorable events took place in 1908, when Lord and Lady Michelham hosted competitors and officials from the London Olympic Games. Their last great celebration at Strawberry Hill was a grand Fancy Dress Ball in 1914, marking the end of an era before the outbreak of the First World War.

Today, Lord and Lady Michelham's presence at Strawberry Hill is less detectable than Lady Waldegrave's, but certainly evident. In their time at Strawberry Hill, the Stern family were clients of Henry and Joseph Duveen, famed interior decorators of Jewish Dutch origin, who courted international fame for selling French antique furnishings, objets d'art, and old master paintings. Though the gilded tables with their cabriole legs and grandiose silver candelabras are no more, a beautiful neo-classical relief sculpture of Virgilia by Thomas Woolner (1871) is still visible in the Pantry.

Most notable today is the Sterns' transformation of the Blue Breakfast Parlour into a plush 'Turkish Boudoir'. Styled as an opulent smoking room, the rich teal walls are bordered by intricate mahogany fretwork on the dado, highlighted with gilt accents. Epitomising the era's fascination with 'exotic' Orientalist aesthetics, a striking tented ceiling envelops the room. The centrally draped velvet tent, originally turquoise and now a blend of green, blue, and yellow, features beautiful appliquéd and embroidered arabesque motifs and scrolling foliage.

In their time, both Lady Waldegrave and the Stern family left indelible marks on Strawberry Hill, though their tenure is often overshadowed by the era of Horace Walpole.

This catalogue is a testament to their lasting impact, documenting the collections, architectural details, and decorative arts that they introduced or preserved during their stewardship.

Though there are tens of thousands who pass by the grounds of Lord Michelham's historic house during the year there are but few who know of the beauties within the boundaries of the grounds surrounding it. The house, originally built by Horace Walpole, was added to by Frances Countess Waldegrave, and the building is now like two houses of totally different styles of architecture joined together. The old building is very picturesque with quaint little windows painted white in which is valuable stained glass. The rooms are very low and small with the exception of Walpole's library on the first floor. The gallery, also on this floor, is a marvel of decoration but is merely used as a passage to the newer building. Through this is the boudoir, a circular room with an oval window filled with stained glass. From here is a lobby leading to the ballroom, which is in the new building and built at right angles to the original. This enormous room was used by Lady Waldegrave

The garden party given by Lord and Lady Michelham to meet the Marquis of Lansdowne and the Vice-Presidents of the London Municipal Society was a bright and enjoyable function, as entertainment of various kinds was provided by well-known "stars" in various line companies. Lord Michelham, who is the first Baron, created in 1910.
In 1910, was an Alderman of the L.C.C. from 1908-1910, and is a son of the late Baroness, Countess de Sten, of Ponthieu. Lady Michelham is the daughter of Mr. Charles Biddle, architect, who was at one time a Major in the Royal Devon Regiment. He was High Sheriff of Devon in 1890.

Originally installed in the Hall by Lady Waldegrave, these tiles feature motifs also used in the Houses of Parliament, signalling to guests that Strawberry Hill was a place for discussing matters of government. Popular in the restoration of medieval churches, this style of tiles also reinforced Lady Waldegrave's continuation of Horace Walpole's Gothic vision for the house.
